Contact: Bill Hensel 404 479 2886

New York, July 7, 2008 -- Invesco today announces that Andrew Waisburd, Ph.D., has joined Invesco Quantitative Strategies as quantitative research analyst. Waisburd joins a team of researchers developing U.S. equity stock selection and global asset allocation models. As a team member, Waisburd will be jointly responsible for quantifying and testing fundamental and behavioral investments insights for inclusion in the expected return forecast models, and for evaluating and enhancing risk models used in the development of specific products and client portfolios. Waisburd reports to Anthony Shufflebotham, head of U.S. research for Invesco Quantitative Strategies, and is based in Boston.

"The addition of Andy Waisburd to our team further strengthens our existing research capabilities," said Russ Kamp, head of Invesco Quantitative Strategies. "Andy's arrival brings our global research team up to 22 to support our expanding number of quantitative investment capabilities for our clients."

With locations in New York, Boston and Frankfurt, Invesco Quantitative Strategies' investment process captures alpha through a systematic application of fundamental and behavioral concepts. This investment process is supported by rigorous research that validates the effectiveness of the investment ideas and identifies potential new insights that may add predictive value as markets evolve. IQS's investment capabilities include active long-only, enhanced, directional long/short (130/30) and market neutral strategies, as well as tactical asset allocation.

Most recently Waisburd was a senior quantitative analyst at Harris Investment Management in Chicago. Previously he was the director of research for NYSE-Arca and an assistant professor of Finance at Texas Christian University.

He earned a B.S. in statistics from Cornell University. He holds both a M.S. and a Ph.D. in Finance from the Kelley School of Business, Indiana University.
